the reconciliation process," he said.

"We should learn from history, from the good developments, from the bad development.

"We should give the lessons we take from history to future generations and I would welcome the building of such a centre."

He said he would consider with colleagues in the European parliament what financial support could be provided.

One of the H-block group of cells and the prison hospital where the first hunger striker Bobby Sands died in 1981 are among artefacts mooted for preservation in the interpretative centre.

Unionists want to avoid a "shrine to terrorism" but republicans believe it would help boost tourism and have denied any plans to glorify violence.

It is one of the issues which have dogged a ministerial Executive which met for the first time in five months last week following a row about power-sharing.

No thanks. KEEP OUT EU. The people of NI wish to move on. Any "shrines" to murderers & terrorists should be confined to specific areas of NI where those communities still live and breathe terrorism and if tourists reeeally wish to go see some wreath or suchlike, they still can.

The Maze should be levelled and a Lidl or something constructed in its place.

Do you think Americans would stand for a shrine located at "Ground Zero" to commemorate the deaths of Al Queda terrorists in the fight against "Western Oppression" (or whatever it was, I forget) during 9/11? Of course not.
